Cold Knap Lake Gillian Clarke

pull a drowned child from the lake. Blue lipped and dressed in water's long green silk she lay for dead. Then kneeling on the earth, a heroine, her red head bowed, her wartime cotton frock soaked, my mother gave a stranger's child her breath. The crowd stood silent, drawn by the dread of it. The child breathed, bleating and rosy in my ...

Cold Knap Lake - Gillian Clarke

For Gillian Clarke, memory is a fickle thing, one that is difficult to properly gauge and define. Her work, Cold Knap Lake, captures the essence of a memory, and nothing more — just its essence, its form with the edges blurred, its finer details hidden. It is a powerful poem that beautifully captures the atmospheric tones of a memory from long ago, and examines the nature of that memory.

Here, Clarke elides the surface of Cold Knap Lake itself with human consciousness. She has been precipitated into this uncertainty and elision through the final shocking denouement to the tale of the child's rescue: 'and watched her thrashed for almost drowning.' Human beings show relief in strange and often disturbing ways.

Here Gillian Clarke invokes nature, much in the style of the Romantic poets. The birds represent different nationalities and as we see there are a variety of them being effected. Third Stanza. In the third stanza of Neighbours, we see here an example of the brutal imagery that Clarke has used. We have the images of birds failing to be able to fly over Finland and their lungs filling with bile.
